NORTHERN PACIFIC ACCIDENT,

Henry George, a teamster, Matt Jarr, an engineer, and a young boy named John Wilson had a close call from being knocked into eternity yesterday at the Northern Pacific crossing west of the section house. They were riding on a lumber wagon, the boy stealing a ride behind. Mr. George and Jarr were talking together and never noticed the yard engine, as they were crossing the track, and as they were partly across, the engine, going about five miles an hour, struck the rear end, knocking the boy quite a distance and throwing both men from the wagon and both men from the wagon and knocking the wagon into little pieces. The locometive was stopped about ha a length from where it struck the wagon. The horses ran away with the fragments of the lumber wagon which was empty, but he did not go far. The boy was carried to his home near by, with one of his arms bleeding profusely. It was ripped open from the wrist to the shoulder. Dr. Steele placed twenty stitches in the gash and believes the boy will pull through all right.
